Salisbury metro area growing at fast pace

Jobs come back to Greater Salisbury

Numbers have hit and surpassed pre-recession high from 2008

It's like the Great Recession never happened in greater Salisbury.

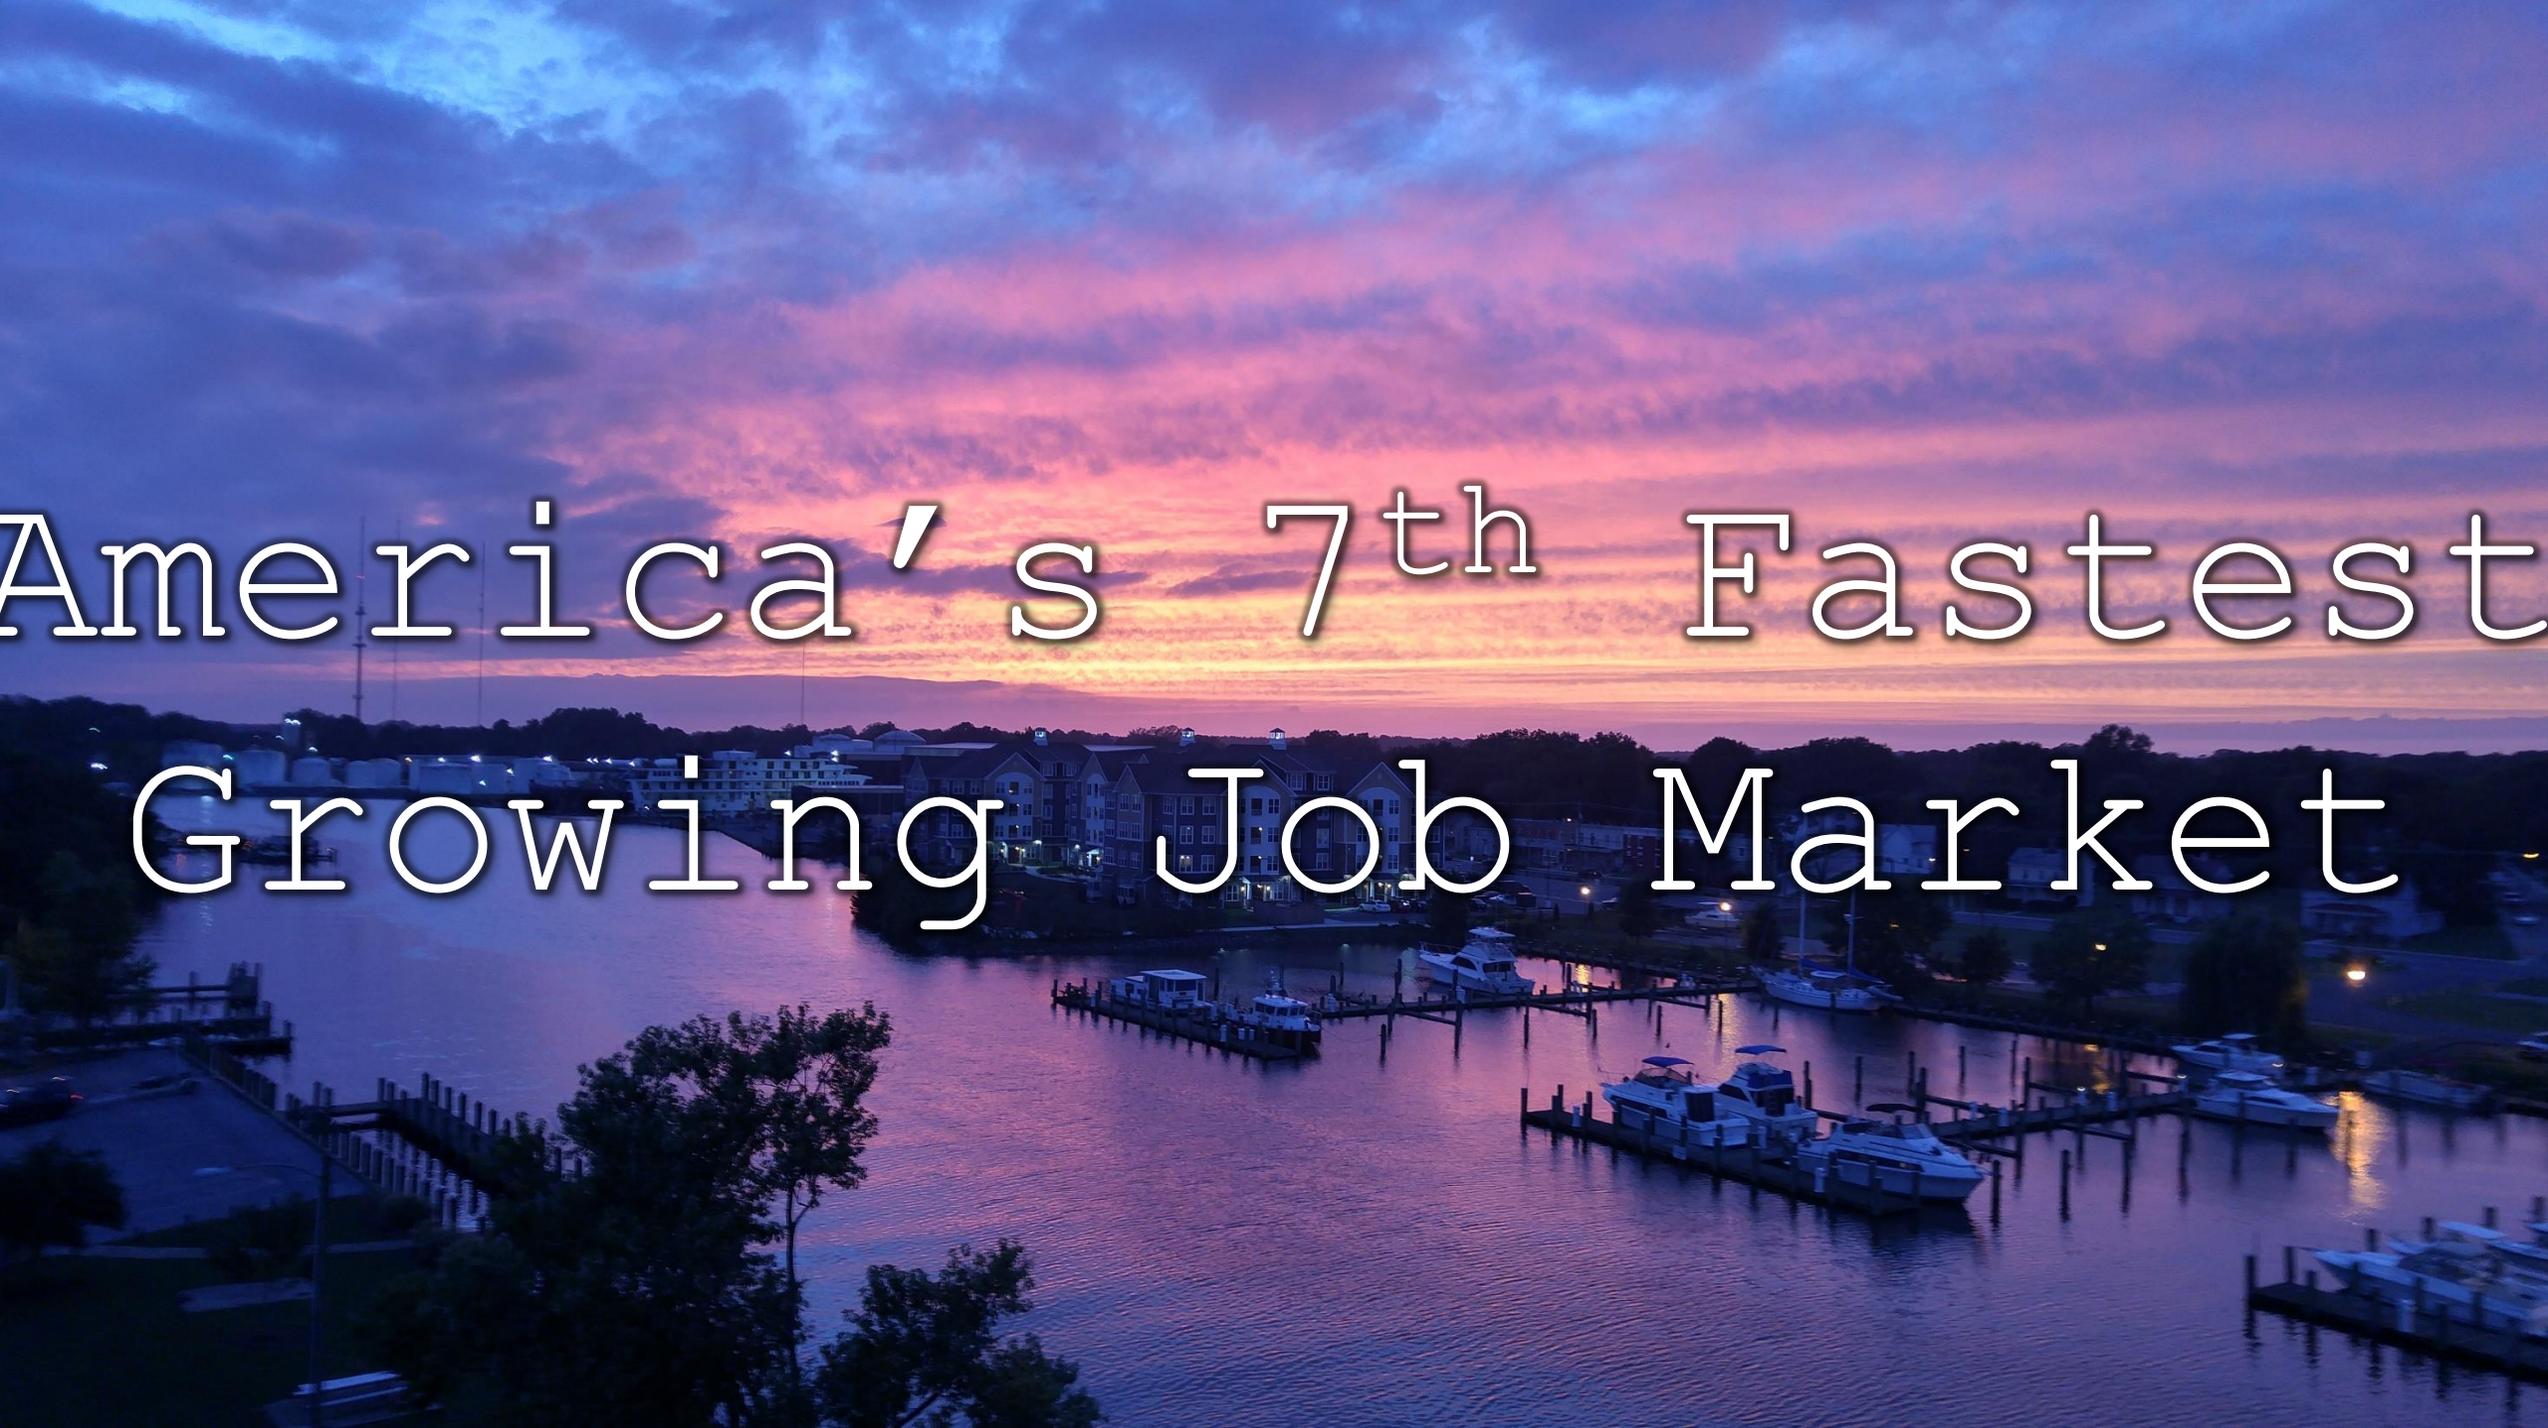

Well, not exactly. But according to a new report, job numbers have hit and surpassed their pre-recession high, which was set during the first three months of 2008.

Somewhere between April and June 2015, the metropolitan area — which includes the three Lower Shore counties of Maryland and Delaware's Sussex County — regained all of the 9,300 jobs lost. And then some.

At the annual meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors in Salisbury, Md., on May 14, the report said that the region's job growth in 2014 was 2.5 percent, or 23,000 jobs. That would put growth in the region at 2.5 percent in 2015.

An aerial photograph of a marina at sunset. The sky is filled with vibrant colors of orange, pink, and purple, transitioning into a deep blue. The water reflects these colors. In the foreground, several white motorboats are docked at wooden piers. In the background, there are multi-story buildings, likely a residential or commercial development, with some lights on. The overall scene is peaceful and scenic.
